

You Be the Judge!

A game of difficult decisions for 4-6 players

What would you say to a friend who cheated on a test? How would you help someone deal with a bully? What if your best friend revealed a dangerous secret and begged you not to tell anyone? In this game, you and your friends decide on the best solutions to a series of dilemmas.

How to Play

You'll Need: 4-6 players, paper and a pencil for each player, a box or other container

Set-up: Write the dilemmas below on small pieces of paper, and put them in the box. Add 5-10 more dilemmas from your own experiences.

Playing: Take turns being the leader. The leader chooses a dilemma from the box and reads it aloud. Allow two minutes for everyone to think and write down what they would do in that situation. Each person reads their solution aloud. Then, everyone writes down their vote for the best solution. Don't vote for your own idea unless you feel strongly that it's the best. The leader counts the votes. The person whose solution receives the most votes gets a point. If more than one person gets the same amount of votes, each of them gets one point.

Winning: Whoever reaches three points first wins the game. If multiple players reach three points in the same round, keep playing until one person takes the lead and wins the game.

Dilemmas

- A kid in your class is always making comments about another kid's ethnic background. Others think it's funny.
- Your friend is having a birthday party. You're not invited, but all of your other friends are.
- You are taking a test and notice your friend is copying someone else's answers.
- When you arrive at a friend's party, her parents aren't there. You know your parents wouldn't want you to be there without supervision.
- You've been chatting on the Internet with a kid you've never met. She wants to meet in person, but you know it wouldn't be safe.
- Your friend has become very quiet and sad lately. He says everything is fine, but you can tell something is wrong.
- You tell a friend something private about yourself, and later find out that he has told others.
- Some kids in the hall at school point at you and laugh. One of them insults you.
